Directory of Wood-Framed Building Deconstruction and Reused Building Materials Companies, 2005

Abstract

This is a directory of companies involved in wood-framed building deconstruction, dismantling and reused building materials, with an emphasis on those that use, resell, and/or re-manufacture salvaged wood. Companies in this directory range in scope from those that carryout targeted building removals, such as historic barns, strictly for the purpose of harvesting the antique wood in these buildings, to companies that conduct residential and commercial demolition where the primary goal is building removal, and the recovery of materials is conducted opportunistically as a by-product. The bulk of companies listed are those that either salvage or sell building materials. For ease of use, the directory lists companies two ways, alphabetically by state and then alphabetically by company type, and alphabetically by company type and then alphabetically by state.

Keywords: deconstruction, used building materials, lumber, recycling, salvage, building dismantling, building removal, building demolition, architectural salvage

About This Directory

This directory was cooperatively developed by the USDA Forest Products Laboratory and the Powell Center for Construction and Environment, University of Florida. Brad Guy, currently Director of Operations, Hamer Center for Community Design Assistance, Pennsylvania State University, was instrumental in creating the database of companies and performing the nationwide telephone survey from which the company contact and general industry information was generated. Information was also provided by the Used Building Materials Association (UBMA).

This is a directory of companies involved in wood-framed building deconstruction and dismantling and reused building materials, with an emphasis on those that use, resell, or remanufacture salvaged wood. The purpose of this directory is to provide a consumer and business resource for locating companies offering a variety of products and services:

- Partial or whole building removals, with a focus on wood materials recovery and reuse
- Brokering, buying, or selling salvaged wood building materials
- Producing, buying, or selling specialized salvaged wood products, such as architectural items or re-milled flooring
- Construction and timber-framing using reclaimed wood in new construction or remodeling
- To a lesser extent, ancillary services such as environmental remediation, recycling, and equipment used in building deconstruction

Companies in this directory range in scope from those that carry out targeted building removals, such as historic barns, strictly for the purpose of harvesting the antique wood in these buildings, to companies that conduct residential and commercial demolition where the primary goal is building removal and the materials are recovered opportunistically as a by-product. The bulk of companies listed are those that either salvage or sell building materials.

To compile this directory, many different sources were utilized. First and foremost, the Internet was extensively searched using several search engines. Lists of contact names were also created from a host of published green building resource guides, the National Wood Recycling directory, lists of organization memberships (such as the Used Building Materials Association), and attendee lists from conferences related to this field.

Starting with a list of about 1,400 companies, a telephone survey was conducted to

1. determine if the services performed by the company were consistent with the information in this directory,
2. collect contact information, and
3. determine the type of business the company is involved in, their range of services, and geographic range.

All companies listed in this directory were contacted by phone and agreed to be included in the directory.

The directory includes timber-framing companies that use reclaimed lumber, as well as companies that re-mill salvaged lumber into other products, such as flooring. Demolition companies are listed if they explicitly indicate alternative services such as environmental remediation, interior and selective dismantling, salvage of wood or other materials, and in many cases where demolition services are combined with used building materials sales or brokering.

There are also listings for companies that deal in historic architectural salvage, which clearly qualifies as used building materials but is distinct from bulk used building materials that are not of high architectural or historic quality. These architectural salvage companies are listed if they appear to be broader in scope than only high-end historic building elements.

A small number of recycling companies are listed, as well as salvage brokers, dealers of equipment related to demolition, and companies that perform environmental remediation. Some large-scale industrial plant demolition companies are also listed; however, building demolition companies are included only if they either focus on or indicate the capacity and expertise to conduct dismantling of residential and commercial structures for the purpose of materials recovery for reuse. Demolition companies that indicate a focus on implosions and highly destructive methods of demolition are not included.

How to Use This Directory

For ease of use, the directory lists companies in two ways:

- Alphabetically by state and then alphabetically by company type
- Alphabetically by company type and then alphabetically by state

The directory uses a code to categorize companies by their primary activities:

BR	Broker of recovered materials
CN	Building contractor or trade that uses reclaimed lumber in projects
DC	Deconstruction company that practices partial or whole building disassembly for the purposes of recovering building materials for reuse
DM	Demolition company that engages in selective dismantling and deconstruction
EQ	Producer or dealer of equipment used in building deconstruction (this does not include heavy equipment)
EV	Environmental services company (such as asbestos or lead abatement)
RC	Materials recycler, and not intended to be inclusive (for example, a concrete recycler would not be listed)
UMS	Used building materials retail sales
VA	Producer/seller of value-added products

In many cases, the companies listed engage in a variety of overlapping activities. For this reason, many companies listed have more than one associated code. The most common examples of overlap include wood salvaging for the purposes of value-added product manufacturing and demolition companies that augment these services with used building materials retail sales.

If the company indicated that they primarily deal with specific species of wood, these are listed under “Species.”

Wood-Framed Deconstruction and Building Materials Salvage: An Overview

Wood-framed building deconstruction is a specific approach to remove materials for reuse in such a way as to preserve their integrity and value to the greatest extent possible and as economically as possible. Deconstruction is generally perceived as manual disassembly of a building, although various combinations of manual and mechanical methods are being studied to improve cost and time performance. Solid wood recovery rates of 50% to 90% are not uncommon. Deconstruction emphasizes a hierarchy of material use; reuse first, then recycle. For example, it is deemed preferable to reuse a recovered timber beam in its whole form rather than grind it up and recycle it into mulch or boiler fuel.

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) estimates that the equivalent of 250,000 single-family homes is disposed of each year in the United States. This represents nearly 1 billion board feet of salvageable structural lumber per year, equivalent to about 3% of the current U.S. softwood harvest. Much of the lumber available for salvage through deconstruction is from decades of old-growth harvest and represents a resource largely unavailable from any other source. As a result, much of this wood is of higher structural and aesthetic quality (higher density, slower grown, fewer defects) than is the lumber produced today. Both reuse (as lumber or timbers) and remanufacture are options for recovered wood. Larger timbers are often used in "timber frame" construction, and if quality is high enough, adding value through remanufacture can be economical. Remilling of old lumber and timber into flooring is the most common end-use, although paneling, millwork, and siding have all been investigated.

Other aspects of deconstruction and lumber salvage should also be considered:

- Holistically, the reuse of lumber products will help conserve our natural resources and ease harvesting pressure on the existing forest resource.
- Deconstruction and material salvage can help reduce building disposal costs, both through savings from reduced landfill tipping fees (including transportation) and because the wood salvaged has resale value. Only in a very few cases will the value of the materials salvaged cover the cost of building removal; however, several case studies indicate that the net cost of deconstruction (deconstruction plus disposal minus salvage revenues) can be from $0.12 to $2.28/ft² less than conventional demolition.
- Deconstruction is labor intensive and takes longer than demolition and landfill. Time can be a major factor in building removal and site renovation.
- Because many buildings slated for demolition are located in areas in need of community development (such as inner cities), many private sector organizations and government agencies view deconstruction as an opportunity for local jobs and entrepreneur training for the construction industry.

Telephone Survey Results

As part of the development of this directory, a telephone survey of more than 1,400 companies was undertaken in spring 2003. In addition to obtaining contact information for use in this directory, questions were asked related to demolition, deconstruction, used building materials, and value-adding activities using reclaimed materials. Because not every company responded to each question, and therefore the response to each question reflects a different number of companies, these results should not be considered a rigorous statistical survey of the industry. However, following are some results that provide a glimpse of the deconstruction and materials reuse industries. Due to multiple responses by individual companies, total percentages may be more or less than 100%.

Minimum sizes and species of reclaimed lumber are important factors to the used building materials industry. It takes as much labor to salvage a 4-ft-long piece of lumber as an 8-ft piece of lumber, and the options for reuse are severely limited in the shorter piece. The industry prefers a minimum 6-ft piece of lumber at nominal 2- by 4-in. dimensions. The desirable species of wood for reuse are oak; pine and its variant, heart pine; and Douglas-fir. These are also the most prevalent species used in U.S. building construction (and hence what is available), but oak and heart pine also have superior qualities for finish carpentry. Flooring is the most common value-added product from reclaimed lumber.

The most common business model for the deconstruction and reuse building materials industry is the combination of deconstruction/demolition and used building material sales within the same company. This provides the opportunity for diversity of revenues and workforce capacity through both the supply side of building deconstruction and the demand side of the retail outlet.
